

On Safari

Large parts of Africa have been fenced into game parks, with lodges, huts, tents and bungalows set up to absorb a steadily growing number of tourists.

Globalization has transformed the safari experience from something that was quite rare and special a few decades ago into mass tourism today. Likewise, Africa's wildlife, long threatened by hunters and poachers, are now big-time tourist attractions.

This series includes images taken in South Africa in early 2018. The series begins in the beach resort of Umhlanga and then in Durban, the third most populous city of South Africa. The actual safari took place in the Hluhluwe-Umfolozi Game Park. Pop-art images of some of the wildlife are also included to underscore their status as icons of the global tourist trade.
